Fruit Of Emotionalism

Chief Justice Earl Warren was the appropriate spokesman yesterday for the U. S. Supreme Court when it upheld the constitutionality of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. The act is a true descendant of the Warren Court's 1954 ruling which deprived the states of historic rights in the field of public education.

We do not know of anyone who expected the Supreme Court to accept the complaint filed against the Voting Rights Act by South Carolina, supported by other Southern States. The philosophy of the justices is such that they approve of laws designed to penalize some states, and to remove states rights long enjoyed by all.

South Carolina's objections to the Voting Rights Act were threefold: 1) That the act robs the states of their right to determine the qualifications of voters; 2) That the act granted the vote to certain citizens who had been found unqualified under state law; and 3) That the act violates the constitutional principle of equality of statehood, since it applies to certain states on a mathematical formula, but not to others.

The Supreme Court's decision leaves the states no further redress in the judicial field. But it is important for the constitutional record that South Carolina set forth its complaint.

In time, the Supreme Court may operate under a different philosophy of law and government. Today's political passions, which excuse any distortion of constitutional process to achieve social and political aims sought by the ruling party, may not endure.

We have little faith in the possibility of a return to the strict constitutionalism of an earlier era. But the liberals of 1966, who rejoice in the Supreme Court decision, may regret the ruling in years to come. In another decade, another group of justices may justify unequal treatment of citizens on the basis of the Warren Court's finding. Unequal treatment of the states lays the foundation for totalitarian rule, and totalitarian is a two-edged sword. It can cut to the right and to the left.

As regards the practical results of the ruling, we don't understand how thoughtful citizens can applaud enrollment under the act of voters who cannot make intelligent decisions on public issues. The act has made possible the registration of numerous illiterates. It is a strange, twisted logic that says this country will be better or stronger by having illiterates participate in the democratic process. In this respect, the Voting Rights Act represents a triumph of emotion over reason. A nation that does not insist upon high standards in voting is in the position of a school or college that doesn't pursue academic qualifications.

The Voting Rights Act unquestionably is the law of the land, but experience is likely to show that it is very bad law indeed.

Guatemala Election

The commanding lead taken in Guatemala by a presidential candidate who has the support of communists is a sad omen for the future of democracy in Latin America.

Guatemala was liberated a decade ago from communist rule with the help of the United States. The prospect that the citizens will vote themselves back into communism — perhaps through ignorance, perhaps on account of subversion directed out of Cuba — does not speak well for the principle of one-man, one-vote in this Central American republic. If a communist regime is not overthrown by military coup, eventually it will impose equality of misery and poverty and set back economic progress.

At this writing, it is too early to predict either that Julio Cesar Mendez Montenegro, described as "a moderate", will take office, or that if he does take office, he will necessarily succumb to the communists who supported his candidacy against two military men. The record, however, indicates that when communists support a party, they do not rest until they take control or are cast out.

Guatemala is a beautiful and ancient land, with limited economic resources. Its people depend for employment on the kind of business leadership that the United States is better able to supply than any other country. If the communists should capture Guatemala through democratic processes, they will have demonstrated the weakness of the inhabitants when faced with such broad issues as freedom and independence.

The DuBois Clubs

Violence at W. E. B. DuBois Clubs in New York and San Francisco raises the possibility of counter-terrorism in connection with a group already branded subversive. Such organizations seem to invite trouble which eventually flares into open strife.

The events at opposite sides of the continent were an explosion and a brawl. They followed on the heels of an effort by the Dept. of Justice to require the DuBois clubs to register as a communist front. Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach informed the Subversive Activities Control Board that the DuBois Clubs are controlled by the Communist Party, USA.

The clubs, named after a founder of the NAACP who joined the Communist Party late in life, have been in the vanguard of the movement that opposes the war in Vietnam.

The official list of communist front organizations is badly in need of updating. Many of the fronts on the list were created in the 1940s and long since have ceased to exist. Many organizations reliably reported to be under communist control have not been listed by the Control Board.

During the Kennedy administration, for example, no action was taken against pro-Castro groups, though Congress supplied evidence of Red involvement. It is encouraging that the Johnson administration has taken the first step to remedy the situation.

Frederick H. Horlbeck

In almost 60 years at the Charleston bar, Frederick H. Horlbeck established a reputation as a keen student of the law. Endowed with a prodigious memory, he retained what he read. A contemporary said of Mr. Horlbeck: "He was a lawyer's lawyer, a walking encyclopedia of the law. You could always count on him to carry his share of the work in a case."

Born of an old land-owning family, Mr. Horlbeck had an abiding affection for the fields and waters of the South Carolina Lowcountry. As a young man he was an enthusiastic sailor. His studious habit soon produced a detailed knowledge of wind and tide that he kept throughout his lifetime.

Though retired from active practice, Mr. Horlbeck's counsel still was being sought almost to the time of his death at 82. He was a quiet, dignified gentleman, courteous to all and a cherished companion among his intimate friends.

Don't Breathe It

Breathing smog all day is as injurious to health, a meeting of persons studying air pollution was told in Los Angeles, as smoking two packs of cigarettes. The meeting took place in the California metropolis because it is perhaps the world's smoggiest city. We wonder whether the federal government will require airlines and other transportation agencies to stamp tickets for Los Angeles (and other smog-bound cities) "CAUTION: This trip may be hazardous to your health."

Backus said he would study the question of returning Brown to jail in Alexandria and would
