

the stage was swept almost bare. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney died on August 16, 1825, and Thomas Pinckney, on November 2, 1828.²⁰⁰

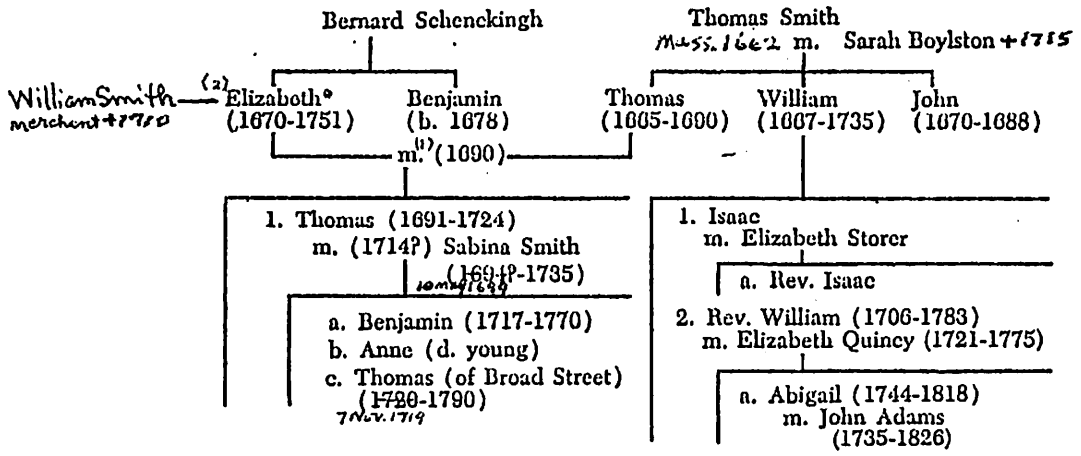

With the death of the old leaders and the corrosion of economic change at work, the state began to exhibit a new public face. Henry William DeSaussure, one of the few remaining Federalist shades, wrote in 1830 of the new possibilities:

There is great and almost universal discontent in this state at the imposition of enormous duties for protection, greatly beyond the actual wants of the government for legitimate purposes, such as the payment of the debt, the civil list, the army, navy, & other indispensable objects. It is believed that a tariff for protection is against the spirit of the constitution, & that it is oppressive, unequal & unjust—it is therefore very generally odious, & is weakening the attachment of the South to the Union, tho' the value of that is felt & appreciated: for you may be assured that all charges of a desire to separate from the Union are fables of a distempered imagination. It may ultimately come to that, because our people would prefer even that deplorable measure, to having a Government of unlimited powers. At present we are divided into nearly equal parts, not at all as to the evil, but as to the remedy, & to the degree of forbearance—if the tariff of protection, & vast expenditure, for internal improvements, become the settled policy of the government, beyond all hope of redress, the separation of the Union will inevitably follow; which I pray God I may not live to see.²⁰¹
